Concert Review: Whole lotta love

By Denise Wheeler

Lez Zeppelin, a New York-based all-girl Led Zeppelin tribute band, brought the epic songs and dramatic stage choreography of one of the world's greatest rock bands to a near capacity crowd at The Stone Church in Newmarket on March 24. Their sound - think Heart playing classics from the Zeppelin pantheon - paid fluent homage to the lush, intricate and driving force that was Led Zeppelin, but the true draw was the juxtaposition of seeing four women playing classic cock rock.

Performing in a tribute band sets many a musician up for derision from musical purists, but there is a redeeming allure to seeing an all-grrl band belt out "In the days of my youth, I was told what it means to be a man," while strutting around with the vibrato and musical prowess of Jimmy Page and Robert Plant. Complete with theatrics ranging from hair flipping to Page's famous violin bow solo in "Dazed and Confused," Lez Zeppelin recreated the iconic nature of a Zeppelin performance. Instead of raising lighters in appreciation, the audience - rapt and crowded around the stage - raised cell phones, taking pictures and video footage. After all, as '70s-esque as the set was, this is the post Station Nightclub world.

While their movement and sound emulates that of Plant, Page, Bonham and Jones, these ladies do not aim to be an impersonation band in the sense of the "trompe l'oeil" artists who also strive to recreate the look. What Lez Zeppelin provides are the amped up guitar solos, driving bassline and thundering drums fans would expect, while conveying a certain charm and sense of fun that becomes a tribute band.

Those ready to rock 2006-style were blown away by the hard-driving opening band, Famous, which provided a welcome contrast to the long, Tolkienesque suites of Led Zeppelin. Ben Phillips, Jamie Perkins and Mark Damon rocked the house with a force unparalleled for the rest of the evening. Their songs, especially "Waiting in Hell" and "Take Me Out," conveyed a rousing energy musically and a streetwise brashness lyrically that made listeners think they will inevitably live up to their name.
